IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Napoleon Movie Picture
At Paris Opera House

PARIS Dec. 17.—Napoleon, the first and great one, will have the honors of the Paris Opera when the most pretentious French film is shown, dealing with the career of "The Star of Twentieth" will be shown at the famous placehouse.

"Napoleon" cost 12,000,000 francs to make, to cost more than 4,000 francs to show, and will have an active career in the big screen, with the series of the big series, with the "Little Corporal" passing before the screen, an historical, based on the famous paintings by Meissonier, and the series of the most important features of the production.

There are true of thousands of people who are left cold by any other form of music, but whose sense of music rises and even leaps at the sound of the horn band. It is not only music, but it is only music possessing the inherent power of all best music to attract and hold an audience. It is music that has in it the spirit of command.

Growing in Number and Public Showing More Interest
Then Ever—British Organizations Have Splendid Tradition to Maintain

By Arthur Mason

"Oh, listen to the Band!" was one of the most popular songs in one of the most popular musicals of some years ago. People have always listened to the band, and taken pleasure therein, and more people do so nowadays than ever before.

More and Better Than Ever
For one thing, there are more bands than ever, and the audience for the band has grown to be an immense host. In the U.S. alone there are thousands of bands. The people who listen to them have millions. The music of the band, in other words, commands and holds the audience that bands deserve the highest respect as one of the best influences at work for the spread of the love of music among the people. And, for another thing, the bands deserve to be listened to more than ever. Their standard of efficiency is a higher standard, and the type of music they play is a better type than the bands of even a few years ago could claim, and is infinitely better type and standard than those of the bands of a generation ago.

The Military Band
The British band has been a great tradition and a great reputation. At its best it is unsurpassed by the military band of any country—a fact for which we have to thank the continuous attention it is given to the authorities, the attainments of the conductor, and its perfectly insistent, high efficiency, perfectly aimed at and constantly maintained at Kitchener Hall, the training headquarters of the country's military bandmen, and a quality in the British band instrument which has made them the great instruments of the world. The great military band holds the attention of a vast public. But there are essentially the attributes of the band world that are added to a musical device, and they share in the dignity that lodges the services of which they are a part.

Now and again they are in the music room with the people, as at the recent nation and in the regional band performances in public places. But in large measure there is a ceremonial function, the glories of the services is about them. They are known to be of eminent respect and, altogether, they are regarded by the mass of people, if with affection, as rather too high for close familiarity on the part of their admirers—just as their music is considered to be not essentially the familiar music of the mass of the people, but the especially expert music of a superior class of musician. The British brass band, on the other hand, is essentially the band of the masses of the people. It has sprung into being in ten thousand places as part of the natural life of the working community, its bandmen are workers, like its audience. The fact that fellow-workers in the factory, the mine or the shop, can become so skilled in music must have astonished the listeners who know these bandmen for what they really are—just the average men of every average community. But it is that very fact which makes the band the most widely loved of all the instruments of music, and probably the most effective musical device to attract and hold an audience. There are true of thousands of people who are left cold by any other form of music, but whose sense of music rises and even leaps at the sound of the horn band. It is not only music, but it is only music possessing the inherent power of all best music to attract and hold an audience. It is music that has in it the spirit of command.

Great Work
The astonishing growth in the number of the country's brass bands is proof of their popularity. Their growth in efficiency is not less so. They, too, like the military bands, have been admirably served by the enthusiasm and the skill of bandmen and conductors, and by the greatly improved caliber of British brass instruments. The band competition movement, has been of enormous advantage as a stimulus to that perseverance in the training of the bandmen, which, in the playing of musical instruments, as in any other form of activity, accomplishes so much. These influences are especially at work today upon the country's brass bands, and wherever there is a band of whatever quality, a little drop of the fire is being poured into the hands of the bandmen, and the result is a splendidly artistic performance, or even close to it, of the highest order. These influences are everywhere, wherever there is a band. It deserves the enthusiasm of all members and the support of its community. For it is certain that all over our country the brass bands are attaching the masses of the people to music, and are projecting the life of the community everywhere the surely needed beneficent influence of music's charm, and solace, and inspiring power.
